Why not take the time to try something new?

Lou Ann Stories

I had a job as a commercial teller in a bank and had the honor of being the first window in the lobby of the bank. As a result, I was almost always busy. I had the honor of meeting many of the bank's customers and speaking with them or business owners on a regular basis.

One of the bank's loyal commercial customers, who owned a coin shop two doors down from the bank, would always ask me to hold in reserve any unusual coins that I got in and he would exchange them for the amount of money at the coin's face value. For instance, I would get a mercury dime in my till and when he would come in, I would tell him about the coin and he would look at it and if he wanted it he would trade me a dime for a dime. As a teller, we could not buy back our own money, so I was happy to do that for him because I had the permission and the blessings of the President and Vice President of the bank, of course. As a result, I became curious about coins and studied them as I found many of them to be very interesting. My father gave me some of his collection and a cousin also had a coin shop, so I learned many things from them about coins.

Well the Vice President of the bank was also a coin collector and we would talk about coins from time to time especially some of the more rare ones.

One day, a bank customer came to my window and rather rudely slammed down a single coin and demanded that I give him change for his coin. Immediately I recognized that it was a fairly rare coin worth hundreds of times more than then face value of the coin. "Sir," I said rather quietly, "you do not want me to give you change for this coin."

"Yes, I certainly do," he exclaimed, fairly huffing at me as if he were beginning to get agitated.

"Sir," I protested, "this coin is worth much more if you will take it two doors down to the coin shop because it is a rare coin."

"I said that I wanted you to give me change for this coin and I want it now. I do not want to go down to the coin shop, I want you to give me change for it. You probably cannot give me change for it," he huffed, this time quite rudely, "I just want you to give me exact change for this coin now."

This time I noticed the Vice President had walked outside his office and noticed that this man was getting a bit rude so he walked over to my teller window to ask if everything was alright. I explained to him that this man wanted change for a rare coin. The Vice President asked me if I knew what change to give to which I replied that yes indeed I knew exactly how much to give him but by bank rules, once I exchanged it, it would belong to the bank.

The Vice President said in a rather smug tone and a wry kind of weird smile to “Just go ahead and give the man what he wants.”

At this point, I took in the coin and gave the man three pennies. He almost screamed and moaned at the same time as if he were in great pain. He asked me for his coin back to which I replied that I could not do. The Vice President was laughing so hard he could hardly take a breath. The man asked me again for his coin back to which I replied that I could not do it. I looked at the Vice President who nodded his head to give the man back his coin. So, I took the three pennies and gave him his coin back, feeling rather puzzled at the Vice President’s reaction.

The Vice President finally explained that the customer had made a bet with the Vice President that no teller he had in the bank would know what the coin was and much less could give him the proper change for the face value of the coin. The Vice President made the bet with the man with the caveat that the VP could choose which teller to take it to for the exchange.

When I told the man that he had a three cent coin, he asked how I knew so much about coins. I explained to him that I was fascinated with coins, especially old coins, and I happened to recognize it. I admitted that this particular three cent coin was the first one I had ever seen in person. He was impressed that I knew the coin. It was indeed an American coin but only minted for a very short time.

He asked the bank VP if I could accompany him into the vault to see his coin collection that he kept in his safety deposit boxes. The VP again made an exception and allowed me to see his collection. Evidently this man was an excellent customer of the bank and was a favorite of the VP and President.

Well, was I ever shocked when he showed me the largest collection of antique coins I had ever seen. There were two large safety deposit boxes filled to the brim with extremely rare coins and gold, all valued at over a million dollars.

It was truly thrilling to see those rare coins in person and I felt very honored that I was allowed to see them and that the customer was gracious enough to show them to me. It was fun to share the excitement over what he had collected over the years. He told me that he was impressed that I was so honest with him and had tried to talk him out of the transaction because it was detrimental to his interests. That is why he wanted to show me the collection because he knew that I knew coins and that I would appreciate the collection. It was exciting to be able to identify coins that I had only seen in photos.

I was blessed that day. It was a beautiful affirmation that honesty is the best policy and looking out for someone’s best interest brought blessings that I could not have imagined.

Also, it pays to go the extra mile and learn about new things just for the fun of it because you never know where the journey will take you. I have learned a lot about antiques as a result of going the extra mile. In fact, I have found many treasures in resale shops and at auctions. It is serendipity at its finest. Once I even picked up a glass made in the late 17th century at Alamo resale shop on Spencer for 50 cents. It was worth much more but very few people would even guess that it was made in 1880 and was worth about $60. So, it pays to educate yourself, to learn about new things, to do research on things that interest you. Not only does it help the mind and ward off Alzheimer’s, it can bring interesting rewards in this journey we call life. Also, it is a blessing to share your knowledge with others so that they might get rewards from your experience. Share your knowledge. Care about others. Be honest and go the extra mile to help others. When you do these things, you will find many blessings, smiles, laughs, and rewards in this journey we call life. Stay strong and keep on learning, sharing and smiling. At least that’s my three cents worth!!!
